Themes can't be all bad

English during the 1969-70 school year was filled with themes, novels, WORD WEALTH, and the usual basic jargon of English.

Students fought the battles with the parts of speech as they have for years. They struggled with diagramming compound-complex sentences, deciding which tense of a verb goes with each noun.

The seventh and eighth grades held interviews with famous characters like Rip Van Winkle. A Spelling Bee Contest proved that there were students at North Putnam who could spell.

When assignments of book reports and research papers were issued, students H. Walters and R. Sharp were found thumbing through the books and magazines in the library.
