All in favor . . .

Communication represents one of the most important assets of a truly civilized society. The act of communication can be met in a variety of ways and on different levels. Certainly one of the most effective ways of creating a "communication path" in schools between the administration and students is through a Student Council.

Members of NP's student council represented the various classes and were elected by the members of each class. They served as spokesmen for the student body and at times acted in an advisory capacity to the administration.

Through these actions, clubs and organizations were introduced and passed, the long-debated topic of "to chew or not to chew" was ended by giving students the privilege of enjoying gum during school hours, and a variety of other problems and ideas were tossed around until conclusions were made or ideas were dropped.

Under the guidance of Mr. Wilson, the council provided a responsible and productive means of communication.

One of the many projects of the Student Council was the decoration of the Christmas tree.
