

Broaden Education

Jim Moore eases an engine into his Brown Beast as the other students in Power Mechanics class lend a hand.

Creative Writing, one of the new courses offered, was taught by first year teacher Miss Ann Knox. The class was conducted in an informal manner, which gave the students a relaxed atmosphere in which to do their writing. They learned many ways in which to express themselves. Also, various kinds of writing were explored, from a fourteen page short story to a one page dialogue paper. The class should prove to be a big asset to the students who plan to further their education.

Speech Class was another course added to the North Putnam curriculum this year. It was also taught by Ann Knox.

Today, when knowing how to express oneself verbally is an invaluable skill, it is reassuring to realize that class work is being directly related to daily living.

Speech class is an example of North Putnam's attempt to upgrade the quality of education that it offers to its students.

Power Mechanics was the third of the new classes this year. Many students found this class not only informative and interesting but profitable as well.

Jim Moore, for instance, used his class time to revitalize his car by overhauling the engine, thus restoring life to his sickly beast.

Power Mechanics was taught by Gregory Arnold, who oversaw many major undertakings in this new course.
