

Thespian Troupe 1478 once again produced two satisfying interpretations of the arts for our community.

The fall play, "Don't Drink the Water," was written by Woody Allen. In it an American tourist, his wife, and daughter rush into an American embassy behind the "Iron Curtain." They are being pursued by the KGB who suspect them of spying. Their escape is plotted by the ambassador's bumbling son. After much tribulation, the parents escape and the ambassador's son and the girl fall in love and get married.

The musical "South Pacific" takes place on a tropical island occupied by U.S. Seabees during WWII. It tells two love stories: one of a young American nurse and an older French planter; the other of a lovely native girl and a handsome naval lieutenant. Suspense, humor, and tears combined with its world-famous songs made "South Pacific" a joy to watch.

Above—top: You prompt them the next time, Michelle. I'm getting tired. Above—left: Is that the way they dress in Sweden, Tina? Above—right: Help! Below: But, Chris, I thought that was MY line!

Above—top: Oh, no! You caught me without my makeup on! Above: Those who help make a production successful but not seen on stage—"South Pacific" crew. Below: A scene from "Don't Drink the Water."

