

Dale Lucas heads to class.

Kara Schraub is caught making noise in the library.

Proud of their accomplishment, these eighth graders stand an egg on end.

Josh Brewer has fun at lunch.

"Enjoying ourselves, are we?"

The nurse's office at North Putnam was a busy place. The nurse, Mary Unger, would see up to 40 students in a week, with the symptoms of headaches, cramps, flu, or minor first aid problems. The most common excuse was "I don't feel well." If a student didn't feel well, she would ask what the problem was, take the student's temperature, and if the student was really sick, the nurse would send him or her home.

It's all in a day's work for Mrs. Unger.

The nurse's office was not always open, though. Mrs. Unger's schedule allowed her to come on Tuesdays and Fridays. If a student got sick when the office was closed, Mrs. Bruner would often see to it that the student was taken care of.

Whatever the day, whatever the excuse, the nurse's office was definitely a part of student life.

(above) Sam Fry stands beside the last of the FFA cornfield. (above, right) Mrs. Patrick and Bridget Perkins look through a magazine for prom ideas. (right) Mike A., Terry G., and Bud M. all make different faces.

