

by Mary Rutherford

Between juggling eight classes and wondering when time could be found to do homework, somehow most students found the time to relax and get away from their hectic schedules. During passing periods, students could be seen clowning around, talking to friends, and frantically searching for homework assignments in messy lockers. Lunchtime also provided students with an outlet for creative energy.

Sometimes, unusual situations arose, affording students the rare opportunity to get out of class. School was cancelled December 18 so that janitors could clean ventilation ducts, thus affording students an extra day of Christmas vacation. An early dismissal because of bad weather in January gave us the opportunity to stay home and play in the snow.

No matter what the circumstances, students always found time to "stop and smell the roses."

Debbie Flint takes a somber look at the thousands of names etched on the travelling Vietnam Memorial.

Justin Barker takes a break from his homework to smile for the camera.

Students loiter in the gymnasium during a school assembly.

Christine Burton makes a rubbing of a name on the travelling Vietnam wall.

Jeff Reed protests about having his picture taken.

